Mercer Island

Most residents of Mercer Island consider it their own special paradise, a woody haven floating in the middle of Lake Washington, suspended by the ribbon of Interstate 90 between the metropolitan hubs of Seattle and Bellevue. While it's an island, Mercer Island is anything but insular; its central location in the Puget Sound region and its proximity to Seattle is one of its attractive attributes.

Mercer Island's six square miles are home to about 22,000 people. Because of its island character, Mercer Island has a strong sense of community. Residents refer to themselves as Islanders and take pride in the Island's friendly, small-town atmosphere.
